A good flowchart is not a freeform mind map. You have to present a logical connection between the elements. To achieve this, pay attention to these details: The location of each item in the flat presentation of the chart. This usually happens top-down. In hierarchical charts, the most important elements are the most important or occupy the highest positions. In a process flow diagram template, the most important elements are the first and the bottom ones are the results. Interconnection These are often used with arrows to show how one item leads to another. A clear arrowhead is important in flowchart templates, especially if an element leads to more than one setting or when the process is reversible or reciprocal (indicated by a line with two arrowheads at each end). Flowcharts are then read based on these tracks. For process flow charts, you start at the top, and depending on the situation that applies, you move from one item to the next. Sometimes a chart will map out the possible possibilities that an approach can do. It will show which next step applies depending on the situation specifics. Sometimes, a chart will simply record the steps you need to complete to complete the process.
